PhD in Media Research and Practice

2019

University of Colorado, Boulder

Dissertation Title: Encoded Inequality: Hacking the Gender Bias in Media Technology

Committee: Andrew Calabrese, Janice Peck, Stewart Hoover, Lori Emerson, Nabil Echchaibi (Chair)

Description: Utilizing a case study of video game systems, my dissertation interrogates the gendered and racial biases and assumptions opaquely embedded within technoculture. It includes: an investigation into gendered discourses of technology; a delineation of feedback loops of gendered cultural-consumer practices of play; a critical examination of sociohistorical and material practices, such as the connection between weaving, feminized labor, and women's bodies; and articulates challenges to digital inequalities through subversive practices from artistic, making and hacking communities.

CURRENT RESEARCH PROJECTS

Remaking in the Revolution: Platforms, Precarious Labor and Intersectional Design

My current book project interrogates the problem of opacity, inequality and labor precarity in modern technology through examining practices that involve reuse, through recycled materials or upcycle practices and which intersect with contemporary digital culture through platforms and the gig economy. I examine case studies wherein objects or materials have gone through material, commodity and digital remediations and interrogate issues of platformization through the concept of algorithmic personalization. Focusing on both discourse and data practices, I critique the problematic idealizations in common and journalistic representations of hackers and crafters and articulate the recoding of inequality in information cultures. Thus, I investigate the ways in which past assumptions, norms, and social characteristics are embedded, transformed, reiterated, and re-purposed in present context. In doing so, I engage with the gendering of precarious labour, not only within the media, but through the materials and practices themselves.

From Hate to Agonism: Fostering Democratic Exchange Online

My current work for the Digital Democracies Institute project includes:

- A study (lead author) that examines the ways in which abusive language and toxicity is conceptualized and moderated on social media platforms and resulting racial discrimination
- A follow-up article (lead author) on how the problematic and inconsistent articulation of abuse and toxicity is amplified in the reporting process.
- A series of workshops and probe kits that draw from critical design practices on the topic of abuse and counter-speech. This process involves hiring, supervising and mentoring graduate and undergraduate students as well as being lead author on a publication from results.
